You're thinking of inviting the new kid in class to join your friends in a multiplayer game. You mention it to a friend in your group and he says, "No one wants that kid in our game."

Response:

I would tell the friend that I like the new kid and think he would make our group more fun. I'd tell other friends about my idea. Then I'd invite him to join our game.

You're working on an online school group activity. You and your teammate disagree on how to solve the problem. She messages you and says, "Does anyone even care about your opinion?"

Response:

I would message the teammate and say, "That's a mean thing to say. Let's just solve the problem. Here are my ideas. What are yours?" If she continues being mean, I'd screenshot the chat and talk to a teacher or trusted adult about it.

Your best friend shares his favorite pop star's latest music video. You don't like the artist or the song and you're thinking of saying so in a comment below the video.

Response:

I would stop and think about who might see my message before posting any comment. I would consider sending a message only to that friend, but then I'd decide it would be better to mention in person, if at all.

You're playing a game on a learning app with friends. One friend answers a question wrong. Everyone starts making fun of him.

Response:

I would post a comment that says, "Not funny. This is a learning app, we all make mistakes sometimes. I know I have."

You found a funny video of your sibling and your dog dancing in the kitchen. You're thinking about sending it to your friends through a message in a game.

Response:

While I think about sending the video, I'd ask myself, "How do I think my friends will respond to this video if I share it? Would they make fun of my sibling? Do I want them to do that?" As I consider, I decide not to share it.

You're mad at your best friend for sharing something that was meant to stay private. While talking to a different friend online, you type out, "What is the point of being her friend?" But you're not sure if you should send it.

Response:

I would tell the friend that I'm upset about what my best friend did. I would take a screenshot of what she shared and with whom and I would talk with my parent or a trusted adult about what to do next.
